

Reconciling Evangelistic Methods with Worship Models:

A Consideration of Apologetic Approaches in the Worship Framework

The following paper was originally presented at the Southwest Regional Evangelical Theological Society Meeting in the spring of 2011. Because I was a guest among scholarly theologians, I began the presentation with what I viewed to be appropriate delimitations.

Before I begin in earnest, a few delimitations are in order. I resonate with Stapert's reluctance in presenting a book on the songs of the early church.¹ Stapert explains that he is approaching the subject as one who would not be considered a specialist in the field of early worship practice and yet saw an obvious need for research in early worship practices. Likewise, C. S. Lewis warns his readers that he is not approaching his study on the Psalms from the standpoint of a theologian.² So I too admit to you today that I come to the topic of worship theology as one involved in training worship leaders, one holding music education degrees, and one who teaches a leadership class on the subject of worship at New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, but not as a theologian.

In terms of theological bias I bring to the subject, I was raised in a Southern Baptist worship setting with my primary formative years occurring in the 1980's and 90's. The glory of God was never questioned but not particularly emphasized as the primary focus of worship. Evangelistic meetings hold a prominent place in my childhood and adolescent memories of worship. I do not believe I ever sought to distinguish what was worship from what was evangelistic. As I moved from being a part-time worship leader to a full-time worship leader and youth pastor in 1999 I began to explore worship from a philosophical standpoint. In fact I have engaged in a decade-old self-evaluation process in relationship to a philosophy on worship. This process began in earnest during a period of time that I worked under the leadership of the Dr. Eric Erskine, pastor at First Baptist Church Havana, Fl. In many ways Eric introduced me to the Reformed perspective, which was an aspect of his training of Dallas Theological Seminary.

¹ Calvin Stapert, A New Song For An Old World: Musical Thought in the Early Church (Grand Rapids, MI: William. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2007), 10.

² C. S. Lewis, Reflections on the Psalms: The Celebrated Musings on One of the Most Intriguing Books of the Bible (Orlando, FL: Harcourt Books, 1958), 1.

I will admit that I began to recognize even from that point in time that the Reformed tradition perhaps did a better job of emphasizing a theology for worship and particular worship forms that match that theology than the traditions of my childhood and youth.³ I will also admit to you that while I have not been converted to the Reformed tradition, I am consciously influenced by the thoughts of this tradition, particularly in regard to worship.⁴

Recent writings reveal that there is at least a perceived problem regarding the proper aim in the corporate worship experience. Duncan stated that “worship is not evangelism (even though many churches confuse the two).”⁵ Whaley and Wheeler recently produced a book that directly addresses the relationship between evangelism and worship.⁶ A recent project at New Orleans Baptist Seminary revealed the sensitivity associated with the purpose of the corporate gathering being about evangelism or worship.⁷ I, too, have wrestled with the question of whether the corporate gathering experience should be mainly about worship or evangelism. I tend to be on the side of worship being the primary driver of the corporate experience, while recognizing that

³ Another important aspect of my journey to understand worship began for me during these years as Dr. Carl Peters introduced me to the writings of Robert Webber, Associate Pastor for Music, Worship and Discipleship at Anchor City Baptist Church, Lexington, KY; During a 7 year tenure at Truett-McConnell College in Georgia I continued to understand the importance of Webber’s influence through the mentoring of Dr. Jon Duncan, Music and Worship Specialist for the Georgia Baptist Convention.

⁴ Since arriving in New Orleans my theological views have continued to be shaped by the excellent teaching of Dr. Bob Stewart through two basic theology classes.

⁵ Ligon Duncan, “Traditional Evangelical Worship” in Perspectives on Christian Worship: Five Views, ed. Matthew Penson (Nashville, TN: Broadman and Holman, 2009), 120.

⁶ Vernon M. Whaley and David Wheeler, The Great Commission to Worship: Biblical Principles for Worship-based Evangelism (Nashville: B & H Publishing Group, 2011).

⁷ David A. Hasker, “Developing a Strategy to Transition First Baptist Church, Melbourne, Fl, from Venue Worship to a Multigenerational Worship Model” (D.Min. project, New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, 2010), 47-48.

in any given service one should anticipate the movement of the Spirit toward salvation.⁸ At the same time, I affirm that it is the leadership team's responsibility to be committed to a clear articulation of the gospel in various ways.

In spite of my own view regarding the priority of worship in the corporate gathering, I hope to present a valid case for rethinking one's apologetic approach in the corporate worship setting, particularly if one views that experience as being primarily an evangelistic opportunity. Certainly, the ideas that will be presented are also valid for those who might see evangelism as a secondary goal of the worship experience. I will explore this issue through the lens of Boa and Bowman's excellent taxonomic reduction of apologetic methods: Faith Has Its Reasons.⁹ Each apologetic category presented by Boa and Bowman will be considered for its merits in a worship setting.

Reformed Apologetics and Worship

The Reformed tradition is quite important in the development of worship practices among evangelicals. For instance, Luther's allowance for artistically compelling celebrative worship experiences bespeaks a richer musical foundation than early Baptist worship practices. Particular aspects of the Lutheran movement were at least evangelistically sensitive. Luther was a champion for worship that was accessible for common persons. Furthermore, Luther's encouragement of liturgies that matched local worship inclinations hints of the cry for relevance by those who would be in favor of evangelistic worship presentations.¹⁰ In regard to Calvin, ⁸ Warren Wiersby, Real Worship: Playground, Battleground, or Holy Ground (Grand Rapids, MI, Baker Books, 2000), 224; Wiersby provides a compelling argument for the priority of evangelism.

⁹ Kenneth D. Boa and Robert M. Bowman, Faith Has Its Reasons: Integrative Approaches to Defending the Christian Faith (Waynesboro, GA: Authentic Publishing, 2001).

¹⁰ J. Peter Burkholder, Donald Jay Grout, and Claude V. Palisca, A History of Western Music, 8th Ed. (New York: W. W. Norton and Company, 2010), 214.

Grout, Burkholder, and Paliska compare late sixteenth and early seventeenth century Calvinist polyphonic settings to “popular Christian music.”¹¹

Boa and Bowman present the modern Reformed apologetic method as “two streams” flowing from the foundational work of Calvin: Scottish and Dutch Calvinism.¹² The presuppositionalist approach appears to be a landing point in Boa and Bowman’s description of Reformed apologetics, and in relationship to this study the presuppositionalist approach is quite appealing in terms of a marriage between worship and apologetics.¹³ The elegance of this relationship is found in the consistent clarity of expressing the chief aim of man, which is consistent with the Reformed tradition in general. Furthermore, although other areas of Reformed theology may be problematic for a given worship leader, this same leader may still find ideal aims in considering the presuppositionalist approach for believers and nonbelievers. Consider, for instance, how the presuppositionalist approach can affect the attitude of the worshipers as they enter the worship setting: Van Till suggested that one’s presuppositions color all that is observed, so the confidence of a believer entering the gathering with a filter toward the Sovereignty of Christ and beauty of His Word would appear to result in a most excellent mindset toward praise.

The Reformed apologetic approach of Van Til’s student, Francis Schaeffer, raises other considerations in the worship context. Namely, Schaeffer’s extension of the presuppositionalist approach toward including a Christianly view of history and the arts in history provides a framework for evaluating the effectiveness of one’s apologetic approach in worship.¹⁴ A major ¹¹ Grout et. al, 221; these polyphonic settings would not be performed in church settings.

¹² Boa and Bowman, 222 and 227.

¹³ Boa and Bowman, 259-283; Boa and Bowman actually use a phrase from Van Til as the title of one of their four chapters committed to the Reformed approach; after an introductory chapter, Van Til and Clark are referenced primarily with references to Plantinga being the main exception.

¹⁴ Frances Schaeffer, How Should We Then Live (Wheaton, IL: Crossway Books, 2005); At the outset of How Should We Then Live, Schaeffer appears to be using the word “presupposition” in a manner similar to that of Van theme in Schaeffer's review of history is seeking a resolution to the ever-present philosophical problem of reconciling universals and specifics. In relationship to this philosophic problem, Schaeffer presents a disparate perspective on reality that emerges in the Middle Ages.¹⁵ The higher view (universals) is labeled grace, emanates from the Creator, and includes absolutes. The lower view (specifics) is labeled nature, emerges from man's perspective, and includes a scientific understanding of that which is visible. What begins in the Middle Ages as a reasonably reconcilable view of reality ends with an irreconcilable upper and lower view of reality, with non-reason or faith leading to hope and reason leading to despair, which occurs in the 19th century.¹⁶ According to Schaeffer the Reformed movement came the closest to providing a cohesive solution to the problem of reconciling universals and specifics.¹⁷

Schaeffer's explanation of the dualist forms of approaching truth from the Middle Ages through the modern age may serve as a mechanism for evaluating the inadequacy of corporate worship experiences that embody the same dualistic mindset. For many worship leaders and participants, the song portion of the service is seen as the entry point to faith, with reason playing little to no role; whereas, the sermon is the rational path to faith. Rather, a recognition of God's transcendent underpinnings for all thought should undergird the cohesiveness of the entire service.

How might one begin a service in the Reformed tradition assuming there may be some consideration of the liturgical calendar? Romans 4:1-4 is a focal passage on more than one liturgical guide for this Sunday, March 20. Thus, righteousness through faith might be the final

Til, but his full explanation of presuppositions and the general content of the book reveal that he is more specifically referring to a particular view of European history from the fall of Rome through the 20th century.

¹⁵ Schaeffer, 55; Boa and Bowman, 447; Boa and Bowman note the influence of Dooyeweerd on Schaeffer in relationship to disparate views of reality beginning in the Middle Ages.

¹⁶ Schaeffer, 55, 163.

¹⁷ Schaeffer, 84.

destination of the music portion of the service. The service could begin with a song that speaks of God as Creator. Songs that speak of God as Creator reflect a “basic” belief in God, which Plantiga emphasizes as a legitimate view for the Christian philosopher.¹⁸ If Plantiga is correct regarding the immediate nature of this knowledge of God, it could be that the singing of Creator God with the low pipes resonating on “Joyful, Joyful, We Adore Thee”¹⁹ or bass guitar providing a firm aural foundation on “How Great is Our God” is an ideal apologetic for the Spirit’s confirmation of this Romans 1 truth.²⁰

“Jesus Messiah” written by Chris Tomlin would be an excellent choice for the song of confession, reminding believers of righteousness imputed and convicting the lost of their need for righteousness.²¹ The service could then transition toward an offering of self and tithes to the Lord through a modern version of “Blessed Assurance.”²² This selection would actually work well here in Texas with a worship band presenting the hymn in a Rascal Flats light rock style. The worship leader could then offer a brief reminder that the promise of blessing over Abraham came through faith (Genesis 22: 15-18), which undergirds the Romans passage. “Come Thou Fount” might be an ideal choice to complete this worship set.²³ The clarity of the prophetic passage in Genesis connected to Christian hymnody within the larger context of a clear progression of theology through worship songs resonates with Paul’s call for clarity in 1

¹⁸ Boa and Bowman, 296-297; F. S. C. Northrop, The Logic of the Sciences and Humanities. (New York: Meridian Books, 1947; reprint, New York: Meridian Books, 1959), 50, 111, 142, 195. Boa and Bowman explain that by “basic” Plantiga means a belief that is not “inferred from other beliefs;” Northrop makes a similar observation in separating scientific knowledge that is known directly by intuition from scientific concepts that are formed through reasoning: “concept by intuition” versus “concepts by postulation.”

¹⁹ Henry J. Van Dyke, “Joyful Joyful We Adore Thee,” (Public Domain, 1907).

²⁰ Chris Tomlin, Ed Cash, and Jesse Reeves, “How Great Is Our God,” (Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 2004).

²¹ Chris Tomlin et al., “Jesus Messiah,” (Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 2008).

²² Fanny Crosby, “Blessed Assurance Jesus is Mine,” (Public Domain, 1873).

²³ Robert Robinson, “Come Thou Fount,” (Public Domain, 1758).

Corinthians 14: 22-25. Thus, a worship ministry of clear proclamation edifies the church and brings sinners to repentance.

Evidentialist Apologetics and Worship

To the extent that a Reformed approach, rooted in an unquestioning authority of scripture, might appear to be most appropriate as a mindset for planning and experiencing the worship experience, so the evidentialist approach might at first glance appear to be the least suited toward reconciling worship with an apologetic approach. After all, we would hope that most of the Christians attending our services do not have to be convinced again and again that the Resurrection did indeed happen. But, I have observed that a powerful aesthetic is often involved in a clear presentation of evidentialist arguments for the existence of God and the Resurrection. For example, a presentation by Craig Keener on his research with miracles encouraged a worshipful response just a few days ago on the New Orleans Seminary Campus.²⁴

How can music match this approach? Although it would be possible to offer short evidentialist statements or slides between songs, the evidentialist argument is typically built in a rich informational manner that would not be conducive to poetic rendering. However, a themed service connecting to an evidentialist sermon to follow could carry a strong cohesive element. For example, consider the following worship set preceding a sermon on miracles:

All Creatures of Our God and King

Power in the Blood

Famous One

²⁴ Craig Keener, "Are Miracles a Problem for Trusting the New Testament?" (paper presented in association with Greer-Heard Point-Counterpoint Forum, New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, New Orleans, February 24, 2011).

This worship set begins with a song reflecting on God as Creator, thus establishing Creation as a miracle calling for continuous wonder. The healing provided at the cross, “Power in the Blood,” is emphasized as a song of reflection and confession. “Famous One” describes Christ as one who is revealed through nature and miracles, thus connecting the transcendence and immanence evident in the person of Christ. Matt Papa’s 23 is a powerful song of healing. I can personally testify to this reality as my wife and I listened to this song during a long drive to commemorate the life of a loved one. The beauty of Matt’s setting is that it faithfully reflects the Psalm, a practice that continues to be an integral part of worship from the early church to the present.

Classical Apologetics and Worship

While Boa and Bowman argue that evidentialism emphasizes the methodological relationship between theology and apologetics, classical apologetics may be most aligned with worship in terms of form among the apologetic approaches discussed in this paper (i.e., the classical approach to apologetics may provide the best model for matching the story form tradition of Christian worship). Worship in the OT and NT is fundamentally a retelling of salvific events: Passover being the story of exodus remembered, resulting in continual rejoicing before Yahweh and the Lord’s Supper being the story of Calvary remembered, resulting in continual rejoicing over the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ.

The classical approach, as described by Boa and Bowman, seeks to establish a Theism and then seeks to build a case for Christ. In a parallel sense, the worship planner seeks to establish God as Lord of all creation, holy, sovereign, just, omniscient, and omnipotent toward the beginning of the service. Then the songs and scripture readings move toward the revelation of Christ.²⁶ The centrality of Christ in the song portion of the service is particularly important in evangelical churches that rarely present the Eucharist.

²⁵ Francis of Assisi, (Public Domain, 1225); Lewis E. Jones, “There is Power in the Blood,” (Public Domain, 1899); Chris Tomlin and Jesse Reeves, “Famous One,” (Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 2004); Matt Papa, “23,” (San Clemente, CA: Maranatha! Music, 2006).

This two-part framework on worship provides the worship leader with a great deal of freedom in regard to song choices. The arts can be incredibly useful for classical apologists partially because arguments can be made with greater subtlety. For example, a worship set might begin with “Indescribable,”²⁷ which aligns nicely with an ontological argument as espoused in the “maximally great” being among all possible worlds theory espoused by Craig.²⁸ While it is completely acceptable for Laura Story to say that the wonders of Creation are indescribable, the same argument would not be acceptable in making an apologetic argument for the existence for God. While the artist is free to say things the serious philosopher cannot say in an official capacity, the apologist’s argument completes the sense of wonder described in the worship art. In reality, both statements (ontological argument and worshipful sense of awe in view of Creation) are difficult to deny. In keeping with a rational movement through the service, “Give Us Clean Hands” is the logical response for sinners who recognize the holiness of God.²⁹ This song also transitions the worshipper or lost person toward the only solution for the human desire to be clean emotionally and spiritually. “Beautiful Savior” is another worship song that marries well with the classical progression of thought at this point in the service.³⁰ To review, at this point in a classical apologetic argument, one is seeking to provide evidence for God’s insertion of hope in a hopeless situation (i.e., logic of Holy God dealing with utterly sinful people would lead to ²⁶ This two-part framework could be viewed as a variation of the standard two-part form.

²⁷ Laura Storye, “Indescribable,” (Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 2004).

²⁸ William Lane Craig, “The Ontological Argument,” in To Everyone an Answer: A Case for the Christian Worldview (ed. Francis J. Beckwith, William Lane Craig, and J. P. Moreland) (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004), 128.

²⁹ Charlie Hall, “Give Us Clean Hands,” (Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 2000).

³⁰ Stuart Townend, “Beautiful Savior,” (Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 1998).

pessimism without the incarnation, crucifixion, and resurrection). “Beautiful Savior” reminds the congregation of their hope and possibly enables the lost soul to see that this ultimate solution is simply beautiful.

Fideist Apologetics and Worship

I will admit to you that I was probably the least favorably disposed toward Fideism as a useful apologetic in worship before beginning this study. My primary concern is that many churches that seek to use their worship service as an outreach event choose songs only for their aesthetic or cultural appeal with too little concern for a rigorous theological approach in worship that provides a solid apologetic.

As the name suggests, Fideism is an apologetic approach that emphasizes faith over reason. Boa and Bowman admit that Fideism is usually applied in a negative sense.³¹ However, they present a legitimate Fideist approach as one that emphasizes faith over reason yet falls short of rejecting reason. Boa and Bowman view Keirkegaard as the primary foundation for Fideism.

From Keirkegaard’s perspective, faith over reason was the best response for the enlightened humanist. According to Schaeffer, Kierkegaard believed that reason (the primary tool of enlightened humanism) always leads to despair, thus “optimistic answers” are only available through faith, which is above reason.³²

The potential for the Fideist approach, specifically in relationship to worship, may be seen most clearly in the secular continuation of Kierkegaard’s thoughts. Specifically this potential will be examined in the relationship between Fideism and art. It is interesting to note that the artistic movements of Keirkegaard’s era were very much a reaction against enlightened thought. As the philosophical pendulum shifted in Europe from the triumph of reason to a recognition of spiritual reality, artists became the new priests of Europe. This can be seen clearly in the cult following of Goethe or Wagner. Thus within the Christian context, art became the best tool for igniting faith based on reasonable principles without using reason.

³¹ Boa and Bowman, 338.

³² Francis Schaeffer, How Should We Then Live (Wheaton, IL: Crossway Books, 2005), 163; Boa and Bowman, 349; Boa and Bowman explain that Kierkegaard saw even the potential triumph of reasoned arguments for Christianity (e.g., historical arguments) as inadequate if the ultimate aim is faith.

Particularly the existentialists, as the secular disciples of Keirkegaard in the late 19th century and throughout the 20th century, discovered the power of art to convey their ideas. Ravi Zacharius explains this connection between existentialist philosophy and art. The following quotes come from separate lectures by Zacharias, the first referring to Nietzsche as perhaps the modern originator of the wise combination of art and philosophy:

He may well have been the bridge between academic philosophy and artistic philosophy because today many young people may say they are not interested in philosophy but their songs philosophize, their movies philosophize, so they are coming up with a philosophy that is not born by studying long treatises on ideas, but they are philosophizing in the sense, they want to tell you what life is all about.³³

The second quote emphasizes the power of connecting art and philosophy:

But let's face it, most human beings will never crack open a book by a Socrates, or Plato, or Aristotle. And have no particular interest on Kant's view of ethics. How do most people today really come to their belief systems? . . . I believe today they come to their belief systems by an invasion of the imagination through the arts, which is a second level in philosophy.³⁴

³³ Ravi Zacharius, "The Loss of Truth,"

³⁴ Ravi Zacharius, "Is Atheism Dead, Is God Alive, mp3 download, accessed March 6; 25:52.

Zacharias goes on to explain that existentialism came to be delivered primarily through the arts in higher education by the 1960's and 1970's. He suggests that the current "popular mind" comes to philosophy primarily through the arts.³⁵

Even as a musician, it is exactly this artistic framework that seems to flow naturally from the Fideist approach that concerns me most. I prefer to get my theology from the Bible primarily and secondly from trustworthy books or persons (lecture setting or informal discussion). But I have also been fascinated for some time with God's apparent plan to use stories to communicate fundamental Old Testament truths in a worship setting, namely Passover and Festival of Booths. Do we believe God was incapable of passing on information to Israel primarily through propositional explanation—again, this is what I prefer—assuming that many of you share my affinity for written and spoken truth?³⁶

To review, I was most doubtful in approaching this paper that Fideism would provide a substantial apologetic. Yet, two valid points remain from the Fideist approach: 1) the continued legitimacy of Kierkegaard and by extension Barth's argument against modern thought and 2) the recognition that art plays a critical if not a primary role in defining the philosophical systems of the twenty-first century.

Furthermore, I would suggest that what is to be gained in considering Fideism is not primarily content but an "infrastructure" for delivery.³⁷ Boa and Bowman support the Fideist idea of infrastructure in a different sense: a life lived for Christ, particularly characterized with love, should be an important aspect of our apologetic.³⁸ I would suggest that this high view of ethics be compared to infrastructure in the sense that our ethic is not the message itself.

³⁵ Zacharias, "Is Atheism Dead."

³⁶ Please note that this argument can be made in accordance with scripture. Many sections of scripture are presented in story form. Of course, a counterargument can be made that some of the most crucial aspects of scripture are presented as careful explanations in propositional form.

³⁷ Zacharias, Is Atheism Dead?; Ravi refers to an "infrastructure of the arts."

Integrating Apologetic Approaches in Worship

In seeking to combine the approaches listed above, the primary concern is a thoughtful approach toward choosing materials for a given worship service and a thoughtful approach toward presenting worship materials over a season or year. Again, the use of Boa and Bowman's comprehensive approach to apologetics proves most useful. The manner in which they highlight various combinations of the four apologetic approaches, including specific examples of which approach to use for specific apologetic scenarios, is certainly thoughtful. Furthermore, their reasonable recognition of value within each approach encourages individuals who might be either purposively narrow in their apologetic approach or unwittingly narrow because of limited reading and experience to equip themselves with a broad range of apologetic tools. Similarly, worship leaders are often limited in their apologetic approach because of a narrow minded commitment to a particular worship format, limited reading on the subject, or limited experience in various forms of worship. The primary admonition for these leaders is: "Be more thoughtful in your approach to worship content."

As stated above, the Fideist approach can be integrated with all the approaches by simply recognizing the power of art in worship. Theologians who fail to recognize this reality do so to their peril. I applaud the movement among Reformed church planters to include relevant art in their presentations. As a general caution regarding extremes, I would warn against the use of artistic presentations simply for their own sake of relevance. Worship leaders may be limited in their use of artistic mediums based on church size and culture, but there should be a relentless commitment to excellence regardless of accessible mediums. Thus, a thoughtful approach toward using artistic mediums should be a regular part of evaluating the effectiveness of one's apologetic approach in worship. Indeed, there appears to be a common acceptance of the importance of artistic mediums by young pastors, but a comprehensive approach to presenting the gospel does not appear to be as pervasive. The inherent logic of the Reformed and Classical approaches may be best suited to a systematic gospel presentation.

³⁸ Boa and Bowman, 480, 489.

Another direct connection of the Fideist approach to various worship settings can be deduced from Witherington's recognition of worship as the highest ethic.³⁹ As stated previously, Fideists highlight ethics as a primary source of one's apologetic. Thus, literally saying in corporate worship that loving God through worship is the highest ethic encourages the non-believer toward a crisis of belief. The Reformed perspective fits well with this call for worship as the highest ethic for the following two reasons: 1) The God of the Bible is not to be questioned but rather recognized as the Triune God and worshipped, and 2) the chief aim of man is rather emphasized.

The Reformed emphasis on liturgy as a systematic vehicle for addressing the full counsel of God's Word on various life issues provides a thorough and thoughtful apologetic approach. The story form of worship, emphasized above in relation to classical apologetics, offers a weekly framework for beginning worship with the concept of transcendence and ending with the concept of immanence.⁴⁰ The sustained history of the liturgy would suggest to us that people do not grow tired of hearing and more importantly participating in the story of Holy God creating humans, humans becoming aware of their sin, Christ atoning for human sin, humans praising Christ for

³⁹ Ben Witherington III, We Have Seen His Glory (Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2010), 7-8; Witherington has clearly established himself as an evidentialist, and yet his emphasis on ethics flowing naturally from his theological disposition reveals some connection with Fideism.

⁴⁰ I am not suggesting a rigid adherence to this model but rather a recognition of the logical presentation of this material.

His victory over the grave and our sin, and humans anticipating eternal worship that has already begun.

The repeated story form itself appears to bring together the classical approach and Reformed approach in an interesting manner. Classical apologists clearly value logic and consistently reveal their commitment to proving God's existence and the legitimacy of the biblical record of Christ. Presuppositionalists argue that logic itself proves God's existence,⁴¹ which would include the logic of the classical approach to apologetics. One could also say that the Bible and by extension history presents the Triune truth in the most logical manner, which matches the progression of thought in the classical tradition. Thus, the logic of the story form of worship is the most glorious progression of logic because of the unparalleled result of the logical progression. By extension, the wisdom and beauty of the redemption plan (reason at its best) is the primary indication of God's existence, if one adheres to the transcendental argument, among all possible arguments from reason both individually and collectively.

The suggestion that the story form be repeated continuously also includes some aspects of evidentialism, which coincides with Boa and Bowman's recognition that classical apologists sometimes appear to be evidentialists when seeking to achieve their second aim, a proof for Christ. In some sense the evidentialist is hoping to overwhelm the lost soul with evidence of a Creator in the hopes that the person might recognize the existence of God as Creator.⁴² A person who has consistently heard songs about God as sovereign, all-powerful, Creator may be in a better position to recognize the truth of this prophetic message. This overwhelming evidence is most important for our children but could also play a role for the lost person who begins attending worship services seeking answers.

⁴¹ Boa and Bowman, 303; Owen Anderson, Warfield, Kuyper, Van Til, and Plantinga on the Clarity of General and Revelation and Function of Apologetics (Lanham, MA: University Press of America, 2008), 55; Boa and Bowman reference transcendental argument but a more basic explanation is included in Anderson's review of apologetics.

⁴² Boa and Bowman, 157-159, 171-173, 211-212.

In conclusion, an eschatological perspective reminds us of the priority of worship. In Witherington's recent book on worship he emphasizes the following question in the final battle between God and Satan as recorded in Revelation 5: "Who shall humans worship?"⁴³ Although most evangelicals likely recognize personal evangelism as the most effective approach within an apologetic framework, relational evangelism that leads the lost soul to a corporate worship setting should result in the realization that these strange new friends are indeed worshipping Jesus. In the more likely scenario, the person who leads one to Christ should look forward to the opportunity to invite this new convert to a corporate worship setting that reinforces the various aspects of the apologetic that might have been used to win this soul to Christ. Certainly, there should be no apology that the beauty of logic or evidences or presuppositionalist arguments will diminish once one becomes a Christian and encounters less convincing worship material. Rather, Witherington argues for the use of the best of Christian poetry in our corporate setting. Certainly, new converts should be overwhelmed with the thoughtful presentation of the Word through various worship mediums both on a Sunday to Sunday basis and from a cyclical manner. Furthermore, new converts should be overwhelmed with the sheer beauty of poetry that tells the story that they have come to love in a manner that is beyond artistic; it resonates with Divine glory.

⁴³ Witherington, 151.

Works Cited

- Boa, Kenneth D., and Robert M. Bowman, Faith Has Its Reasons: Integrative Approaches to Defending the Christian Faith. Waynesboro, GA: Authentic Publishing, 2001.
- Burkholder, J. Peter; Grout, Donald J. and Palisca, Claude V. A History of Western Music. New York: W. W. Norton and Company, 2009.
- Craig, William Lane. "The Ontological Argument." In To Everyone an Answer: A Case for the Christian Worldview, ed. Francis J. Beckwith, William Lane Craig, and J. P. Moreland, 124-137. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004.
- Crosby, Fanny. "Blessed Assurance Jesus is Mine." Public Domain. 1873.
- Duncan, Ligon. "Traditional Evangelical Worship." In Perspectives on Christian Worship: Five Views, ed. Matthew Penson, 124-142. Nashville: Broadman and Holman, 2009.
- Dyke, Henry J. Van. "Joyful Joyful We Adore Thee." Public Domain, 1907.
- Francis of Assisi. Public Domain, 1225.
- Hall, Charlie. "Give Us Clean Hands," (Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 2000).
- Hasker, David A. "Developing a Strategy to Transition First Baptist Church, Melbourne, Fl, from Venue Worship to a Multigenerational Worship Model." D.Min. project, New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, 2010.
- Jones, Lewis E. "There is Power in the Blood." Public Domain, 1899.
- Keener, Craig. "Are Miracles a Problem for Trusting the New Testament?" Lecture presented in association with Greer-Heard Point-Counterpoint Forum, New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, New Orleans, February 24, 2011.
- Lewis, C. S. Reflections on the Psalms: The Celebrated Musings on One of the Most Intriguing Books of the Bible. Orlando, Fl: Harcourt Books, 1958.
- Northrop, F. S. C. The Logic of the Sciences and Humanities. (New York: Meridian Books, 1947; reprint, New York: Meridian Books, 1959
- Owen Anderson, Warfield, Kuyper, Van Til, and Plantinga on the Clarity of General and Revelation and Function of Apologetics. Lanham, MA: University Press of America, 2008.
- Papa, Matt. "23." San Clemente, CA: Maranatha! Music, 2006.
- Robinson, Robert. "Come Thou Fount." Public Domain, 1758.

- Schaeffer, Frances. How Then Shall We Live. Wheaton, IL: Crossway Books, 2005.
- Stapert, Calvin. A New Song For An Old World: Musical Thought in the Early Church. Grand Rapids, MI: Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2007.
- Story, Laura. "Indescribable." Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 2004.
- Tomlin, Chris and Jesse Reeves. "Famous One." Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 2004.
- Tomlin, Chris, Ed Cash, and Jesse Reeves. "How Great Is Our God." Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 2004.
- Tomlin, Chris, Daniel Carson, Ed Cash, and Jesse Reeves. "Jesus Messiah." Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 2008.
- Townend, Stuart. "Beautiful Savior." Brentwood, TN: EMI Christian Music Publishing, 1998.
- Wiersby, Warren . Real Worship: Playground, Battleground, or Holy Ground. Grand Rapids, MI, Baker Books, 2000.
- Witherington, Ben. We Have Seen His Glory. Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 2010.
- Zacharias, Ravi. "Is Atheism Dead? Is God Alive?" Ravi Zacharias International Ministries website. mp3 file. <http://www.rzim.org/resources/listen/letmypeoplethink.aspx?archive=1&pid=1965> (Accessed March 6, 2011).
- Zacharias, Ravi. "The Loss of Truth: Part One," Ravi Zacharias International Ministries website. mp3 file. <http://www.rzim.org/resources/listen/justthinking.aspx?archive=1&page=20> (Accessed March 6, 2011).

